PLANT MORE LEGUMES

The desirability of increased seedings of annual legumes and hay is stressed in the 1931 Crop Outlook Report issued today by the United States Department of Agriculture, in which it is pointed out that increases in the world acreage devoted to grain crops and large-scale farming is making it increasingly difficult to produce grains at a profit on many types of land.

The salvation of the farmer, particularly in the drought areas, it is indicated, lies largely in the line of increased plantings of annual legumes and grasses for forage, pasture, and hay, which offer immediate cash returns and a means of overcoming the existing feed shortage, as well as to pave the way for permanent improvement of the farm situation.

Probabilities that the price of wheat will remain low are referred to by the Department as grounds for devoting greatly increased acreage to annual legumes and hay crops. These crops are "cash crops" in the truest sense of the term this year, and will result in an immediate increase in the farmer's buying power, as well as meeting his own needs for animal feed.

The diversion to such other crops of land on which wheat can be raised only at high cost and often without profit, it is brought out by the Report, will also assist in solving the perplexing problem of the wheat surplus. Further, it is pointed out, there has been a definite increase in livestock, particularly in cattle and sheep, in recent years, warranting an increase in alfalfa and other legume hays. Also, in some of the areas in which dairy cows are largely raised, they are under-supplied with legume hay, which, to a great extent, can replace expensive, high-protein commercial feeds.

Much of the area in last spring's legume and grass seeding is either burned out entirely or is so badly injured that recovery cannot be expected within a full year's time. As a result, hay and pasture crops are shortened to a dangerous point, supplies of forage are low or gone entirely and an even greater shortage threatens unless legumes and grasses can be restored. Hay is relatively high in market value, current price induces placing this commodity in a most favorable position. Grain prices, on the other hand, are at an unprofitable level, and all interested agencies are unqualifiedly advocating reduction in spring wheat acreage.

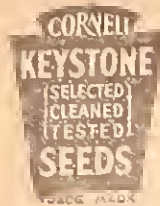

With this condition, the Crop Outlook Report indicates that it is urgent that plans be made immediately to replace the shortage by arranging for the sowing of grasses and annual legumes as soon as the season permits. Not only will this promise a sufficient hay crop for 1931, it is pointed out, but it will provide a definite and practical means of securing permanent relief.
